This programme is structured to provide students with a solid theoretical and practical content, with the end goal of preparing them for an international career in the field of Human Resource Management. The blended learning model incorporates a variety of different pedagogical methods, including traditional classroom lectures and tutorials, as well as individual and group work outside of the traditional classroom setting, as well as company visits and field-work projects. The capstone project for the students is supervised by the teaching staff, and students who successfully complete the assignment get academic credit toward their degrees. The language of instruction is English.

The members of the faculty who teach in the Graduate programs have a wide range of academic and professional backgrounds. A professional team offers continuous support for the activities that take place on campus, in addition to providing distance tutoring via technological communication.

The course is designed to evaluate business conditions and identify problems using knowledge of core functional areas in contemporary organisations. As the HR field is changing rapidly and needs creative, highly trained professionals who can meet crucial organizational challenges across the public and private sectors, the HR functions now go far beyond recruiting, training, managing personnel policies and ensuring equal opportunities. The aim is to gear students through an HR career professional who facilitate company mergers and acquisitions, enhance productivity and quality, embrace information technology and big data, and even help ensure overall competitiveness in an expanding global economy. While tomorrow's demands will likely be even greater as this dynamic field continues to evolve, students will develop an ability to evaluate businesses and identify solutions based on knowledge gained on the course to make better business decisions. The students will be required to evidence an ability to absorb theory and apply the same to practical business situations.

Students will come up with solutions based on their own analysis using different forms of assessment such as examinations, coursework, posters, presentations, and project reports.
